if the costs associated with having traditional phone service is a lot less because of automation then maybe the focus should be on the technology outside of the houses. Certain living situations like a household where there are more 1 or 2 children and an unemployed adult. Or maybe if they live outside city limits I can understand support (in reduction of fees) for this purpose. If determining eligibility by income, when people log into their account they should have to report this information, that they don't work, etc. It should be limited to one per residential address. Phone cards and pre paid phones are really cheap. Other non-traditional housing situations should be handled by case.
